

the king owned land which he could donate to the archbishop. The church had already gained a consecrated cemetery from the king with lay beside the Royal Demesne. However these final quick succession dates above belie the turmoil needed for Christianity, after 300 years of trying, to be finally established in Sweden.

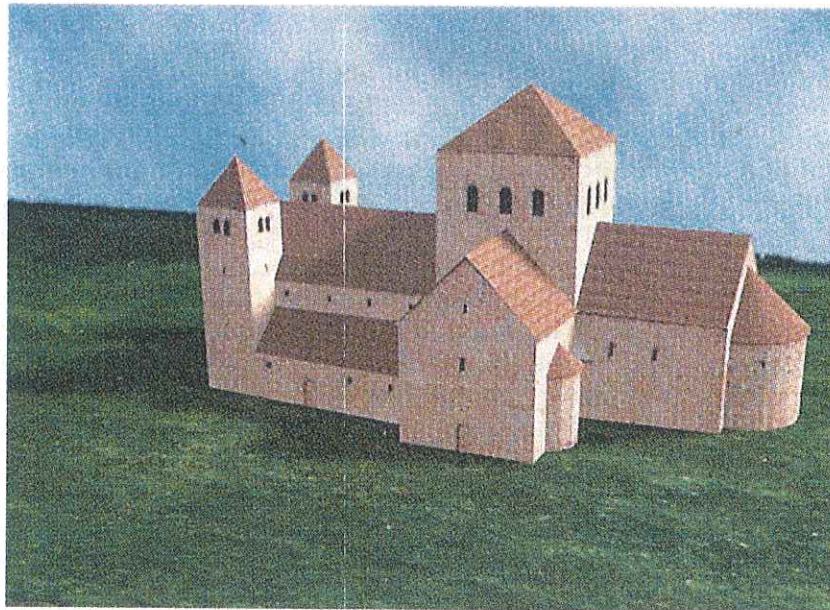

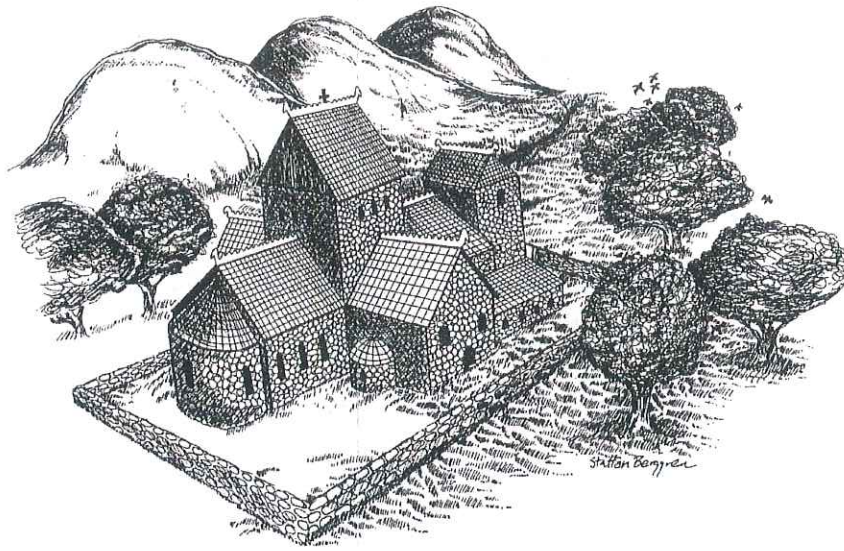

Figure 11: Two different reconstructions of how the cathedral at Gamla Uppsala may have looked when it became the seat of the first Swedish archbishop in 1164. The western end of the cathedral is the most uncertain part.